

I received my Ph.D. in medieval European history from Emory University in 2007. My main research interests are in the field of conflict, law, and violence during the central Middle Ages in western and central Europe. My current project deals with very local social, economic, legal, and institutional history in Anjou, Touraine, and Maine, ca. 900-1200. My teaching interests, however, are much broader and include global history (teaching both halves of the survey in global history), the history of the ancient, medieval, and early modern Mediterranean, along with Classical Civilization courses (e.g., Mythology) that I teach with a Mediterranean focus.
