

Marianne Kupin-Lisbin is a Ph.D. candidate at the University of Rochester, where she specializes in the history of Southeastern Europe with comparisons in the Mediterranean world. Her research centers on multi-faith communities, belief, practice, and identity in the pre-modern Balkans with emphasis on marginality and family structure. Marianne is in the final stages of completing her dissertation, "The Illusion of Dissidence: The Virgin Mary, Rome, and Local Catholicism in Seventeenth Century Bosnia," which she will defend in 2020. Afterwards she will begin work on her next research project which will examine the sex trafficking and enslavement of Romani women in late medieval and early modern Wallachia and Moldavia. She is currently an instructor for the Rochester Education Justice Initiative and the Cornell Prison Education Project.
