

Dr Erin Maglaque is a lecturer in early modern history at the University of Sheffield. She completed her D.Phil at the University of Oxford in 2015, and held postdoctoral fellowships at Oxford and Harvard. Her research focuses on the history of Italy and the Italian Mediterranean in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Her first book, Venice's Intimate Empire: Family Life and Scholarship in the Renaissance Mediterranean was published by Cornell in 2018. She has published articles on questions of imperial governance, humanism, and the literary culture of the Venetian Mediterranean. Her current work examines practices of care work within the family, concepts of 'chosen family' and fictive kinship, and surrogacy practices in early modern Italy.
