

Johannes Makar is a PhD Candidate in Department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations (NELC) at Harvard University. His research interests lie in the social and intellectual histories of Orthodox Christian communities in the Eastern Mediterranean. In his dissertation, Johannes examines how Coptic intellectuals responded and contributed to reformist currents in late Ottoman Egypt.

At Harvard, Johannes has served as a Teaching Fellow in courses on modern Middle Eastern history, Islamic intellectual thought, and Arabic. Since 2018, he has also coordinated the Research Methods in Islamic Studies Workshop for the Alwaleed Islamic Studies Program (AISP). In this capacity, he has organized an ongoing series of seminars dedicated to library research, digital scholarship, and manuscript studies. In 2018-2020, he co-convened the Middle East Beyond Borders (MEBB) workshop.

Johannes earned an MSc in Middle East Politics from SOAS, University of London, and an MSc in Economic Policy from Leuven University. He also completed studies in Arabic and Islamic Studies, Philosophy, and Political Science.