

Patrick Morgan is a Ph.D candidate in the History Department at UCLA studying the legal history of the twelfth-century Kingdom of Sicily. His dissertation project, advised by Jessica Goldberg, examines the dynamics of local legal change in twelfth-century Salerno, with a particular interest in the relationship between large-scale projects of royal law and local practice. His work has been supported by a Fulbright Fellowship and the UCLA CMRS Center for Early Global Studies. He also serves on the editorial board of the CMRS Center's early-career academic journal, Comitatus and is a board member of the UCLA Medieval and Early Modern Student Association.
