

Brian Phillips Murphy is associate professor of history at Rutgers University-Newark. He is a founding co-director of the Mediterranean Displacements Project at Rutgers-Newark, an interdisciplinary faculty initiative advancing scholarly research and undergraduate pedagogy around questions of migration, displacement, refugees, and climate change in the Mediterranean. His first book, Building the Empire State: Political Economy in Early America, won the 2015 James H. Broussard Best First Book Prize from the Society for Historians of the Early American Republic. His current book project, tentatively titled Great Falls: Water, Power, and Alexander Hamilton's Vision of Industrial America, will focus on the political ecology of the founding of Paterson, New Jersey as a manufacturing hub and explore how Mediterranean-area migrations shaped both the economic and environmental destiny of the Passaic River and the labor history of the United States. This new work is being supported by research fellowships at both the Washington Library at Mount Vernon and the International Center for Jefferson Studies at Monticello. In 2020 Murphy became director of a curricular initiative to create an interdisciplinary minor program focused on studying the U.S. and state constitutions through the lens of climate change. This "Climate of American Constitutional Democracy" project won a planning grant from the Teagle Foundation and has resulted in a new partnership with the Quill Project, a digital humanities initiative based at Pembroke College, University of Oxford that documents constitutional conventions.