

Nicole Archambeau is a historian of medieval health and healing at Colorado State University. Her recent book, Souls under Siege: War, Plague, and Confession in 14th-Century Provence, considers how people understood these moments of danger as sicknesses of the soul and tried various methods to heal them. Her new research project looks at health and nature in Mediterranean agricultural practices. She is particularly interested in methods used to raise healthy bees and the healing uses of wax and other bee products.
