

Moshe Blidstein is a historian of the Mediterranean in the Roman Empire and late antiquity, teaching at the Department of General History at the University of Haifa, and a research member of the Haifa Center for Mediterranean History. He specializes in the religions in the Roman Empire, especially concerning ritual and ritual discourses. He has studied especially discourses of purity and defilement in early Christianity and its historical contexts and the changing character of oaths in the ancient Mediterranean cultures of the Roman Empire. His book, Purity, Community and Ritual in Early Christian Literature, was published in 2017 by Oxford University Press. Recent publications include “Invoking Humans in Roman-Era Oaths: Emotional Relations and Divine Ambiguity” published in Numen and “The Ambivalence of Purification and the Challenge of Transformation in the Rites of Passage and in Early Christian Texts”, published in the Journal of Classical Sociology.