He also holds an MA in Teaching Spanish as a Second Language from the University of Salamanca and a second MA in Spanish and Latin American Literature from the University of Colorado Boulder. For his doctoral studies, he specializes in early twentieth-century Spanish literature, especially in the works of Catholic writers. His main research project explores the different perspectives that existed within Spanish Catholic culture and their relation to the Church's official position. He concretely analyzes the intersection of these discourses with gender and sociopolitical theories, explaining, for instance, the literary manifestation of the relationship between theology and social class.
