

Professor Gómez-Bravo is a Spanish medievalist at the University of Washington, in the Spanish and Portuguese Department and in Jewish Studies. Her main research areas are theories of race, textual studies, food studies, and gender and sexuality studies. Her most recent publications focus on the development of concepts and terminology relating to human difference in the late medieval and early modern periods. She has also published several studies on food practices in the Hispanic World, and more recently on Sephardic food and the notions of historical memory and heritage. Currently, she is working on a book-length project tentatively entitled “Blood Purity and the Rise of Race and Caste in Late-Medieval Iberia.” The book examines the racialization of Jewish and converso minorities and the biologization of difference alongside notions of limpieza or blood purity in late-medieval Iberia. She argues that the rise of blood purity and its attendant notions and language helped establish and institutionalize “racial” and “caste” differences.
