Saad Latif is an MA student of Global History at Rutgers – Newark. He received two prior undergraduate degrees from the same institution, first in Computer Science and Mathematics in 2015 and another in History, International affairs, Islamic and Middle Eastern Studies in 2021. His research includes history, politics, and cultural exchanges between the Middle East and South Asia with a focus on transnational Islam and digital humanities. He has previously done research on Muslim military participation in colonial India and the literary memory of Al-Andalus in South Asia. He was recently awarded the CLS language fellowship to study Persian in Tajikistan over the summer and is aiming to pursue further graduate education in Near Eastern Studies at NYU's Kevorkian Center in the fall.
