

Reem Taha is a PhD candidate in Comparative Literature at UC Santa Barbara. She holds an MA in English literature with a collaborative degree in Book History and Print Culture from the University of Toronto. In her doctoral work, she specializes in Mediterranean Studies, Andalusí Studies, and travel literature. Her dissertation outlines a comparative and interdisciplinary study of Morisco communities between the fifteenth and seventeenth centuries, with a particular emphasis on the ways in which the movement of the Moriscos facilitated textual exchanges between Arabic and European languages, creating networks of literary connectivity across and beyond the Mediterranean. She also explores the resonance of Moriscos in early modern English literature.
